

Business analysis is a critical process that drives organizational structures and systems within the context of varying stakeholder interests. The business analyst defines and evaluates potential initiatives that best fit organizational goals. Business analysis is all about defining and obtaining value from an organization's project initiatives and other endeavours.

The business analyst's primary job is to see to it that correct solutions are fashioned out to enable the organization to achieve its business objectives. The business analyst is also responsible for benefits realization i.e. to see to it that the value of delivered project outcomes is actualized in the organization. Consequently the business analyst will be involved in enterprise analysis, requirement analysis and other related activities aimed at this primary purpose.

The business analyst is just as indispensable as the project manager especially for organizations who want to ensure that wrong solutions are not implemented efficiently by trained project managers!
